

Meljac expands its range of products for export

Meljac, the French creator of luxury electrical fittings, is continuing to develop its catalogue by expanding its range of brass products for the export market to comply with regulatory standards and aesthetic tastes in different countries.

The range, aimed at architects, interior designers and specifiers working on international projects, now includes screwless sockets that are compatible with British back boxes.

This is a new addition to an already extensive series of switches and sockets suitable for use in several countries including Germany, Switzerland, the United States, the United Kingdom and Italy.

A major innovation for the British market

Meljac is proud to unveil a screwless socket for the British market – a sleek, high-end product that is fully compatible with British technical requirements. This innovation means that Meljac can now include British sockets in its Solaris collection, developed in collaboration with the famous designer Marc Newson. Solaris is characterised by distinctive rounded brass plates with no visible screws.

This latest breakthrough also opens up possibilities for projects in Middle Eastern countries, many of which have similar electrical standards to the United Kingdom.

Meljac's expanded export range consolidates its position as the partner of choice for prestigious international projects, with products that blend compliance, innovation and sophisticated design.

Meljac quality for international projects

Customisation and bespoke design have always been central to Meljac's range of products for export. It brings its celebrated expertise to every project and offers a choice of nearly 30 finishes on brass.

The extensive colour chart reflects Meljac's expert craftsmanship in surface treatment, a key process completed entirely in house in its own workshops. This sets the company apart, guaranteeing a consistent level of technical quality and aesthetic excellence.
